Description: The facade has been altered in the mid 20th century for office use in the building. The main change was the lowering of the doorway to street level. The opening has a brick frame and a recessed modern glass door. Above the doorway is a hexagonal window with a brick frame. The marble facing of the basement was replaced by common bond brick. The window bays remain as built with tall narrow 6/9 sash on the first floor and 6/6 on the other floors. Fine cast iron grilles are attached to the first floor windows. Dentil moldings decorate the lintels. The attic story has three small rectangular windows with single vertical muntins just below the dentil cornice. The Mulberry Street elevation is painted brick with an irregular fenestration pattern.

Significance:

Area: architecture; local history

Level: local

The Walter Poultney House retains more of its 19th century ornamentation than any of the four rowhouses in the 300 block of St. Paul Place, in spite of the altered doorway. The Poultney family owned the house from the late 1850's to 1946. The most well-known of the Poultneys to live there was Walter de Curzon Poultney (died 1929). A life-long bachelor, he was prominent in society affairs and was famous for his elaborate clothes, handle-bar mustache and goatee, and elegant antiques. He traveled widely and the St. Paul Street house was filled with art objects, silver, china, and glass from these excursions. One of the last of the wealthy residents of the Cathedral Hill area, he maintained his aristocratic lifestyle in the face of the growing commercialization of his neighborhood. At his death, the contents of his house were sold at a public auction which attracted buyers from several states. The house became a lunchroom and restaurant and later was the Salvation Army local headquarters.

a great risk. But, seriously, I could not

Because you had a Scriptural excuse?"
said Mrs. Brookes, smiling maliciously.

The fact was, little Julie Smith, standing before the mirror and covered with jewels, was rather a conspicuous figure. The younger woman colored, but she did not flinch, meeting his eyes bravely, she gave him a smile that half included Julie.

"This young lady is—" he began, cursing his carelessness in bringing her there, and then he stammered like a schoolboy caught in mischief. He had not thought to ask her

The elder woman turned on her heel and walked to another part of the shop. Vaughn followed her at once. "That is a little country cousin of mine," he explained. "She's in town for the day, and I am showing her the glories of the world. You know, I come from New England."

"That's right, Horace," said Mrs. Brookes, heartily. She was a good-natured woman and daring, after a fashion, to be so. "At first I had an idea. Never mind—but it is a surprise you're not ashamed of your relatives. I'm in such terror of mine. They keep me slinking about in carriages. I daren't go into the big shops I so adore for fear I'll meet them. They're messengers of Satan sent to buffet me, and they're always turning up. Sometimes I think I'll defy the whole world and acknowledge them and get my liberty, and then I simply can't—my position isn't sufficiently established."

Everybody laughed. Mrs. Brookes stepped to a mirror to adjust her veil, and Edith Maynard said to Vaughn, in a low voice:

"Your little cousin is so young, I dare say we embarrass her. She looks very sweet and good."

"And so does somebody else," said Vaughn, sincerely and so simply that Edith, who was used to nothing from him but a touching gallantry, felt her cheek flush. She suffered her eyes to meet his a single instant, and for the life of her she could not keep the secret an instant longer. It was mirrored in those clear depths. She felt (she could not lift them again) Vaughn in turn redden from throat to brow, and, as in a dream, she heard him say:

"Good-by !"

"You are going away?" She forced the words from her white lips.

"Yes, I am going away, and, Edith, this is good-by."

She felt his hand close on hers. It was the first time he had ever called her by that name, and something told her it was the last. She looked, and he had gone.

"It's my turn now, really," he said when he and Julie Smith were in the street. "We are going to the Metropolitan Museum, for it is a free day, and I will show you what you like, and what I like, and what we both ought to like, and none of them will be the same picture. No; we won't take the Fifth Avenue stage. I am sick of Fifth Avenue. We'll go over to Broadway, where we belong, and see human beings and breath the atmosphere they breathe."

"Not where we beng; where I belong," rected Julie Smith. "But, oh, I am so thankful to get out of that dreadful place!"

"What—there? Why, that is the paradise of women. They go there when they die, if they're good enough. I thought you were delighted in there." blance to the features of that they had left in the other street than one of Nast's caricatures is like a Greek statue.

Vaughn looked at them with a strange interest. Certainly, this had been an unusual day. If all days had been like this—but it

"No, you did not," said the little girl
—not a little girl any longer, and even Vaughn noticed how the soft features had seemed to define themselves in the last hour.

"No, you did not think it a paradise for me. I don't know you very well, but I know you feel things—oh, almost before they happen—and that you were very uncomfortable for me. There are two worlds, aren't they?" she went on. "The one I saw there and this one, where I belong."

She looked down the long street; it was crowded with people, pressing one another in an unwieldy yet good-natured mass. The features of this crowd bore no more resemwas too late to think of that now. He would enjoy to-day.

Meanwhile the ladies in the jeweler's were elaborately talking of something else, till suddenly Mrs. Brookes laid her hand on Edith Maynard's shoulder.

"Forgive me, Edith, but it was so unlike Horace, it upset me. He's such good form, you know. Why, you're looking hurt, angry—why, Edith, don't you know it is hopeless, that he is impossible, that he is bad, bad—""

"Hush, hush," cried Edith Maynard. "I know it and I can't bear it. Oh, Horace!".

The elder woman looked away. She was 336 St. Paul Place was the home of Walter deCurzon Poultney for sixtyffiveyyers. Poultney was one of the leaders of Baltimore society for years and the great grandson of Ellin North, who is considered the first white child born in Baltimore. He traveled extensively and had crossed the Atlantic Ocean about thirty-eight times, he bought many rare and beautiful art treasures, furniture, and paintings on his trips abroad. His home was filled with treasures; the neighborhood of 336 St. Paul Place used to be one lite neighborhoods but as Baltimore grew larger and business advanced into the area, most of the residents moved out of their homes and consequently the homes were destroyed. But, Poultney declined to move out of the district because of deep attachment to his family home; he became the last old resident to live in the neighborhood. Because of these factors his home became a landmark. The contents of the home and the owner are no longer present which gave the home its fame but the building is still significant even in its altered state because it is the only remains building on the block that was originally built as a residence for the wealthy .
